Claims Rise in Payroll Survey Week as Job Market Still Reeling

Initial jobless claims unexpectedly rose to 1.1M as the labor market's recovery remains precarious. Delayed and reduced supplemental payments cloud the spending outlook with 28M continuing claims across programs.

Back Above One Million

- Initial jobless claims rose unexpectedly for the week ending August 15, crossing back above one million to 1.11 million.
- The latest numbers on initial filings overlaps with the August payroll survey week. From the July survey week, initial regular claims fell by 316K, a sharper drop than the weeks leading up to the July report. Yet with claims still hovering around one million, the jobs recovery still has a long ways to go.

Continuing Claims Still High as Benefits Shrink

- Regular continuing claims fell by 636K the first week of August, but PUA claims rose the prior week. President Trump has approved $300 in extra weekly benefits, down from $600 at the end of July, but states need to apply to FEMA and reconfigure payment processes. While payments will be retroactive, only a handful of states have been approved and the delay in payments will weigh on spending given the lofty ranks of the unemployed.
